And that were a hard thing for him to do. Much is sometimes used by Shakespeare as an adjective, sometimes as an adverb, and at others as a noun. He is given = he is accustomed. There is no fear in him. There is no cause of fear in him. Fre3h and merrily. When we find two adverbs joined by a conjunction it is not uncommon to find only one with the adverbial termination -ly! as true and faithfully, sprightly and bold, apt and willingly, cheerfully and smooth, bitterly strange, etc. Let not our looks put on our purposes, but rather disguise them. Put on is used in the same metaphorical sense in-- He pu(s on this tardy form. --Act I., Sc. 2. You look pale and gaze, Andpitt on fear, and cast yourself in wonder. Act...
