It is rather warm, I confess, the Limpet replied; but it is only for a little time. The floodtide will come soon, and the first wash of spray will revive me. No, no! nothing short of death would induce me to leave my rock. The light glittered through the transparent body of the Prawn, and the Anemone heard him laugh as he moved away. I'd rather die than be chained there, he said. What must I do to be kept safe? the Anemone asked. I am so soft and weak that I am sure the storm would soon finish me. I have not even a shell to guard me. Find a sheltered corner, and cling fast, was the advice of the Limpet. The tide had turned some time ago, and there was a booming sound in the distance, and a rustle among the fronds of the wrack, which was hanging like a heavy fringe upon the edge of the stones. The sea was coming. Slowly it came, yet strongly; it broke in frothy foam against the brown rocks, and flowed into the pools, sending volumes of sharp cold water over the drooping wrack, and the sea-grass blistering in the heat. Ah, ah! laughed the Crab, here comes the tide! This horrid warm water will get freshened up now. A great...
