Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.The crossing from Dover to Calais had been rough; a drizzling rain fell all the time, and most of the passengers had remained below. Strange to say, they were few enough, as I saw on landing. It was a Sunday in late July, and there ought to have been a strong stream setting towards Central Europe. I hardly expected to find much room in the train; not that it mattered, for my place was booked through in the Lucerne sleeping-car of the Engadine express. Room! When I reached the siding where this train de luxe was drawn up, I saw that I was not merely the first but the only passenger. Five sleeping-cars and a dining-car attached, with the full staff, attendants, chef, waiters-all lay there waiting for me, and me alone. Not very busy? I said, with a laugh to the conductor. Parbleu, replied the man, polyglot and cosmopolitan, like most of his class, but a Frenchman, or, more likely from his accent, a Swiss. I never saw the like before. I shall have a compartment to myself, then? Monsieur may have the whole carriage if he wishes-the whole five carriages. It is but to arrange. His eyes glistened at the prospect of something special in this obvious scarcity of coming tips.
